

Ken Gamble

Leading International Private Investigator

"My work has no borders..."

For more than two decades international private investigator Ken Gamble has been successfully tracking and capturing some of the most elusive con artists and fugitives in the world. From kidnapping to fraud to financial scams that total in the millions, Gamble has stayed one step ahead of the competition leaving a trail of criminals behind bars.

An expert at navigating his way through a world where political, cultural and legal differences are often as complex and dangerous as the criminals he is tracking, Gamble has emerged a leader in foreign intelligence and surveillance. Working with a team of strategic alliances that form a global network that spans across 15 countries,

Gamble is one of the few of a new breed of international private investigators able to meet the increased challenges of a world that is in the midst of history-making change.

Most recently on May 11, 2009, the powerful combination of Gamble's unwavering commitment, expertise and heart resulted in the return of a young girl into her Australian mother's arms after she was kidnapped by her Egyptian father at the age of four. Gamble first learned of the case in April 2007 when the story aired on Australia's A Current Affair when he watched the segment about a fruitless effort to find and rescue a little girl kidnapped by her strict Muslim father and living in hiding in Egypt. Gamble knew that he not only could but had to do something to help right this tragic wrong. Gamble was retained by the show to work on the case and started a long and complex search with the desperate and heartbroken mother, which ultimately led to the rescue of her daughter.

Long after the television show had given up in late 2007, Gamble had not, providing free investigative and legal support for the mother. His dedication to the young mother and daughter and to his profession ended in a first dangerous, then beautiful reunion on the streets of Egypt that was captured on camera and recently aired on Australia's Nine Network. The leading current affairs show only became involved again after realizing that Gamble had independently located the fugitive father and his daughter.

Among his many distinctions, Gamble is also the international private investigator who was responsible for tracking and exposing the mastermind behind one of the largest fraudulent international ticket rings of all time, the 2008 Beijing Olympic ticket scam that robbed people worldwide of millions of dollars.

Gamble, who is considered by industry experts as a mastermind himself at cybercrime investigations, had been tracking the criminal organization since 2003 and utilized some of the world's most sophisticated tracking resources to expose the British based group that maintained more than 150 online ticketing websites.

Further evidence of the global importance of what he calls his work with no boundaries, is that Gamble seems to uncover new scams wherever he travels. During his recent trip to France for the Cannes Film Festival, Gamble received information about one of the largest rental property scams ever to hit the festival, where over 100 victims from all over the world paid upfront fees to secure luxury accommodation on a well designed fake website. The fees were all wired into a Dutch bank account during late 2008 and early 2009 but no accommodation was ever provided. Gamble is presently investigating the scam and working with the French police in his efforts to track and capture the perpetrators of this international crime.

Gamble also serves as founder and president of Gamble Investigations International (GII), an independent investigative consultancy that specializes in international investigation, corporate intelligence and protective security. Trusted with high-profile cases that can only be solved by proven professionals with specialist skills that are able to analyze clients objectives and employ extensive in-country resources to turn those objectives into reality, Gamble maintains offices in his native Australia, Belgium and Egypt and will be opening offices in the United States in the near future to further accommodate the continued international demand for his one-of-a-kind services.